Proper efficiency and success of Resident doctor requires an optimal functioning and emotional wellbeing. Every doctor faces some Psychiatric problems in residency period right from starting of his residency period. A major cause of this can be due to adjustment issues in new college environment , financial worries , separation from his/her undergraduate college friends, or due to sadness of being homesick. These issues if not reported then will lead to clinical depression and even self-injurious behavior. These can be avoided by learning coping skills and some support from teachers, seniors and colleagues. Proper psychoeducation can also prevent residents from falling in trap of substance use disorders leading to psychosocial issues, headaches, financial strain, poor performance academically.

Methodical training on coping skills and awareness will certainly lead to a better outcome and prevent suicides among medical students and residents. With this intention, this training programme was conducted for 2nd year PG students at Index Medical College, Indore.

Students were first informed about the psychiatric problems faced by residents during the residency period and how to help each other and oneself to cope and even seek proper psychiatric help if warranted. Every resident should be aware of the red flag signs of mental illness and seek timely intervention from psychiatrist. This was primarily discussed in details in the educational programme.

All these skills were taught to the students systematically, along with many real-life case studies for each module. Similarly, students were trained about how to converse with their seniors, colleagues or junior and their relatives to seek timely help and support.

Besides, students were also informed about how to deal with some special situations like how to create work life balance and destressing exercises etc.
